International Development
Bachelor of Science
2017-2018

General Areas of Service:
A B.S. degree in International Development will prepare students for opportunities in the business operations of international and domestic development agencies in accounting, finance, marketing, human resources, fundraising, and other related areas. The business emphasis, combined with language, travel abroad, and other cultural requirements, will likewise prepare students for global humanitarian service.

Most global/international economic development programs fall under the auspices of social science departments such as economics, political science, and geography. This new program is unique in that, while interdisciplinary in nature, it offers a strong business component that will qualify graduates for both international and domestic career opportunities.

Professional Training:
In addition to strong business preparation, this degree requires a broad slate of courses in foreign language, culture, religions, health, communication, fundraising, project management, and infrastructure/engineering. One of the most important requirements is the completion of an internship abroad in which students gain exposure to international culture and development issues.

Denominational Opportunities:
Currently positions are open in the Adventist Development and Relief Agency and numerous church-related global humanitarian organizations.

Job Outlook & Compensation:
Careers in International Development include project management, accounting, finance, fundraising, grant writing, contract specialists, and business development. Levels of compensation vary significantly among the different positions and organizations. However, due to the humanitarian focus and nonprofit nature of most development organizations, compensation levels are commensurate with those of related positions in domestic nonprofit organizations.
