FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
May 21, 2020

Walla Walla University will welcome students back to its campuses in the fall for the 2020-2021 academic school year, prioritizing safety and quality education, announced WWU President John McVay today. “We believe that a strong, active community is absolutely central to the education provided at Walla Walla University,” said McVay.

University officials are working diligently on strategies to facilitate on-campus instruction, he said. Local health officials will help identify prevention measures, as well as options for testing and treatment to allow for a significant emphasis to be placed on illness prevention and community health.

“Meanwhile, we remain fully focused on Walla Walla University’s mission, and I’m heartened by the strong intent of our students to come back in order to continue building their lives in community with each other,” said McVay.

Read President McVay’s full statement at wallawalla.edu/coronavirus.

Walla Walla University is a Seventh-day Adventist institution of higher education founded in 1892. The headquarters of WWU is located on an 83-acre campus in the Walla Walla Valley in Southeastern Washington state where cultural arts, vibrant dining, and recreational opportunities abound. The university also operates four satellite campuses, including a School of Nursing, a marine biology station, and School of Social Work and Sociology campuses.

###